A Happy Family Abroad.

A cansumptive man leading a half-starred sheep-killer, lugging the trimings of a cocking stove and other camping out utenals on his back, passed through here last Friday, with two wives and the red-hand, have-footde children. One of the wives was drunk, and looked like boiled down degittution, and had no doubt escaped a powerful Winter's feeding, and subsisted on the salrill winds that poured through the Cumberland Gap for many months. A short litter-view learnd the Nxws that "the dog was sood to watch things, but had to be tied to keep him hous running away"—to keep him hous running away"—to hunt a morsel of meat, no doubt. The destitute family gathered what few pennics they could from the cold, uncharitable public, and moved on to they knew not where.

ACROSS FRANCE IN WINTER TIME.

To diffusive and extravagant Americans the most striking features of the country are the compactness of the habitations and the extreme economy—I cans the most striking features of the country are the compactness of the habitations and the extreme economy—I may almost say the paraimony—of the method of tillage. Every square foot of ground is put to use; has been in itse for unnumbered generations. Here and there in the distance appear patches of wood, carefully preserved and guarded, but the rest of the land is almost bare of shade. There is no brush or tangle of weed and wild flower by the roadside, no thicket by the stream. The last of these trespassers were eradicated ages ago, along with the last stump. Agray stone-wall borders the highway. The cross-roads are often sunk two or there feet below the general level. Narrow ridges of earth mark the boundaries of the fields, and the furrows or dryen so close to them that it is a wonder how the plow is turned. Single rows of populars stretch with exasperating regularity across the landscape. They are trimmed close, and sometimes every twig is removed except a bunch at the extreme top; then they look like liberty poles with bushes tied to them. There are willows by the brook, but they are pollard-willows, kept for their twigs, which are scrupulously cut off, and they lift their scarred and knotted trunks, like hands from which all the fingers have been amputated. One beauty of the countery is in its fertility and the varied contour of the ground; but the traveler who looks upon it cannot help longing for a little of nature's lucruinat triegularity, and thinking how much more of clematis and bind-weed covered the boundary wall. We passed a village of clematis and bind-weed covered the boundary and thinking how much more of clematis and bind-weed covered the boundary and thinking how much more appropriated with exernes upon a ridge of limestone. The cole under the houses was perforated with exernes deed by wooden doors, and used apparently as stables or store-coma.—J. R. G. J. Rassard's letter to the New York Tribune.

LORD REACONSPIELIPS IDEAL.

If he had been possessed by a great love of truth or of humanity, all might have come right, he would have quickly worked through his youthful cynicism to something higher. But pride and ambition, the pride of race and the pride of genins, left no room for these sentiments. His intellect was keeptical. His heart was somewhat cold. Before him lay a world in which fame and power were to be won by the gifts which he knew himself to possess; the laurela of others would not let him sheep; and he threw all his soul into the pursuit of fame and power.

It was a poor ideal. But he seems to have thought it the only ideal, and probably looked on those who strove after some other as either fools or hypocities. Early in his political life he said one day to one of the foremost of his political opponents (from whom the present writer heard the anecdote), as they took their umbrelles in the vestibule of the House of Commons: "After all, what is it that brings you and me here? Fame I This is the true arena. I might have occupied a literary throne. But I have abandoned it for this career."

Win.

It is to-day the only Journal in the United States called "8AZOO," name by its founder, from the Cherchee Indian language, and signifies "Mucin Wind." This paper owns a Telegraph Wind." This paper owns a Telegraph with the cream of the news from coast, or coast, and from the North Pole to the Evergiades of Florida. Bits of Sensation, the best of bloridar Bits of Sensation, the best of blorids and the day of the day of the world through the medium of the most skilled and cheeky reporters that both, the news just as it is, without color or exageration.
